I think Adam is spot on. If we want to restore the market's trust in biotech the first step is to stop IPOing preclin companies that are 3-4 years from meaningful clin data, esp when valuations are >500M
These companies don't belong on the public markets

Adam Feuerstein @adamfeuerstein · Jan 5, 2022

Replying to @PeterKolchinsky

Peter, what I and others know is that there are more preclinical, riskier companies going public now than in the past. Trend is clear. That's not healthy for "the market." We all know you don't see this as a problem, and we expect you to make excuses for it.

tbh I don't think that's a major issue for 99% of public biotechs. imo most of them are credible and transparent about their activities. imo problem is the disconnect between valuations and risk profile + time to value creation
